Boiga is a typeface by Kel Troughton. Its soft edges, bulky joins, and overlapping outlines make it a great headline. The family was drawn originally as an outline, but it also comes with a regular version that makes up the filled-in letter. Boiga's shapes come from two very different sources. The first is bold signage and packaging found around Tokyo, which often features heavily outlined type. The second source is a type of graffiti referred to as a fill-in, with rounded simplified shapes and clear outlines. Both sources rely on a friendly and cute demeanor, and sometimes anthropomorphic shapes. The name Boiga references two subjects:

1. A snake with sectional body markings that is kinda cute.
2. A goofy way to say the word burger.

Update, V3, August 2026

Text

Boiga is a large genus of rear-fanged, mildly venomous snakes, known commonly as cat-eyed snakes or simply cat snakes, in the Family Colubridae. Species of the genus Boiga are native to southeast Asia, India, and Australia, but due to their extremely hardy nature and adaptability, have spread to many other suitable habitats around the world.

There are 38 recognized species in the genus. According to the study done by Jiří Smíd regarding Old World cat snakes, the ancestor of the cat snake originated in Africa, from where it diversified and expanded to other countries. Despite this diversity however, the different species have very similar needs in terms of temperature and precipitation. Cat snakes are long-bodied snakes with large heads and large eyes. They vary greatly in pattern and color. Many species have banding, but some are spotted and some are solid-colored. Colors are normally black, brown, or green with white or yellow accents.
