Junct is at its core two things: A (sort of) revival of Rudolf Koch's Neuland, and an Extrapolation of the logo for Schoolhouse Rock! drawn by Tom Yohe. An easy choice for setting titles big and loud, but it works hard across the eight weights to be useful in a range of applications. The organic curves and bottom heavy contrast let it overlap naturally with a sense of stability at the baseline. Junct is drawn by Gwenola Kidd Corbett at BoyishType.

Junct Regular 36/40

Neuland is a German typeface that was designed in 1923 by Rudolf Koch for the Klingspor Type Foundry.

Koch designed it by directly carving each size of each letter into metal.

The original typeface thus had a different appearance in each of its sizes, something not followed in digital versions where the same font serves for every print size.

While originally intended as a form of modern blackletter, Neuland has come instead to be used as a signifier of the "exotic" or "primitive", such as in the logos for Trader Vic's, Natural American Spirit cigarettes, promotional materials for The Lion King, and the Jurassic Park films (which use the "inline" variant, so named because each letter has a thin line inside); the association of this "exotic" or "primitive" implication with African or African-American themes has been criticized. Sample of Neuland Inline

Neuland Inline is a common variant of Neuland, perhaps more common than the standard variety.

Koch spent his teenage years working in Hanau as an apprentice in a metal goods workshop, whilst also attending art school, where he learned to draw, and soon after went to the Academy of Fine Arts, Nuremberg. Between 1897 and 1906, he worked for various businesses in the book trade in Leipzig, illustrating and designing book covers in the Art Nouveau style that was popular at the time.[1] In 1906, Koch began working for the Rudhard Type foundry in Offenbach, later known as the Klingspor Type foundry. Other notable designers who worked for the foundry include Otto Eckmann and Peter Behrens.[2] Koch was deeply spiritual and a devout Lutheran, spending much of his time working on religious publications and manuscripts, of which he completed nearly a hundred in his lifetime. Koch viewed the alphabet as humanity's
